Will YOUR Wiring Stand the EXTRA Post-War ELECTRICAL LOAD?

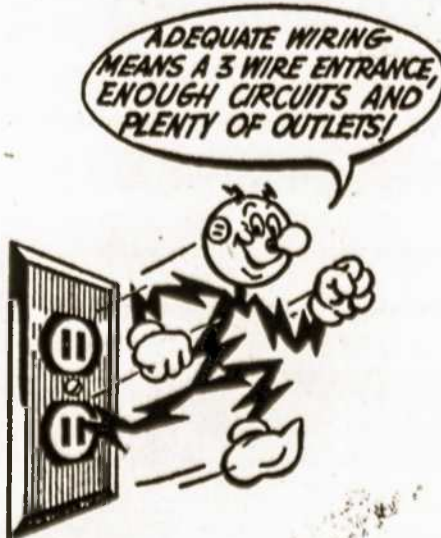

A WIRE, LIKE A CLOTHESLINE, CAN ONLY CARRY SO MUCH LOAD

The wiring in most homes was installed years ago when the electrical load was comparatively light—serving only your lights and probably a flat iron.

Each year the load has grown heavier as you add more electric servants—a refrigerator, washer, vacuum cleaner, radio and more lighting for better seeing.

After the war—this load will increase suddenly as dozens of wonderful new electric appliances come onto the market—home freezers, air conditioning units, television sets, clothes driers, etc.

WILL YOUR WIRING STAND THE LOAD? That's a good question for you to ask your electrician.

Summer 1935

"Gee, I've got an awful sunburn, Daddy."

Summer 1945

"Oh, it's just a few blisters, Dad."

The volume of long-distance telephone calls here in New England always goes up in the summer vacation season.

But this wartime summer of 1945 brings another big user to the long-distance telephone lines—the homecoming-fighting man. Whether here for hospitalization or redeployment to the Pacific, or for discharge, the first and practically universal desire of these veterans on debarking is to telephone back home.

You can readily see then, why your long-distance telephone call may be delayed these days. Whether you're at the shore or in the city, you can help our returning veterans get home quickly by telephone by making only necessary calls and keeping them as brief as possible.
